How a home-made snack empowered Indian women

Devina Gupta, 2nd January 2025

On a chilly December morning, a group of women wrapped in colourful saris, warm shawls and woollen caps huddled outside a three-storey building in a busy neighbourhood in Delhi.

Within the walls of the building ran a unit of one of India's oldest social enterprises, owned and run by women.

The co-operative - now called Shri Mahila Griha Udyog Lijjat Papad - was started in 1959 in Mumbai (then Bombay) by seven housewives who made the humble poppadoms, a crispy, savoury snack that is a staple of Indian meals.

Sixty-five years later, the co-operative - headquartered in Mumbai - has spread across India with more than 45,000 women members. It has an annual turnover of 16bn rupees ($186m) and exports products to countries including the UK and US.

Working mostly from home, the women in this co-operative produce items including detergents, spices and chapatis (flatbreads), but their most-loved product is the Lijjat brand of poppadoms.

"Lijjat is a temple for us. It helps us earn money and feed our families," says Lakshmi, 70, who manages the Delhi centre.

Ms Lakshmi joined the co-operative about four decades ago after her husband died, which forced her to look for work.

The decision to join the women's co-operative transformed her life, she says. She now manages 150 women at the centre.

For women like Ms Lakshmi, the co-operative offers a chance to earn a decent income while balancing their work at home.
